Although endothelin-1 (ET-1) level is altered during human menstrual cycle, little is known about its level in the pregnant human uterus. An ET(A) receptor specific antagonist, BQ-123, has been shown to induce a reduction in endometrial blood flow, which is associated with the inhibition of implantation. However, the precise roles of ET(A) receptors in the progression of implantation have not been elucidated. The present study was undertaken to determine whether the ET(A) receptor and ET-1 are involved in the proliferation and decidualization of endometrial stromal cells (ESCs) during early pregnancy, and whether the ET(A) receptor is up-regulated by estradiol (E2) in ESCs cultured in vitro. ET-1 level was determined by radioimmunoassay in human endometrial biopsies obtained from early pregnant (cycle Day 10-13) and nonpregnant (cycle Day 5-9) women. The protein and mRNA levels of ET(A) receptor were measured by reverse transcription polymerase chain reaction (RT-PCR) and immunocytochemistry, respectively, in ESCs cultured in vitro. ET-1 level was increased in early pregnant endometrium compared with that in nonpregnant endometrium. ET(A) receptor expression was up-regulated in the ESCs treated with E2 and progesterone. ET-1 is increased in early pregnant human endometrium. ET(A) receptor expression was up-regulated in the ESCs treated with E2 and progesterone, which may play an important role in the control of endometrial blood flow during early pregnancy. 156 B.R. 753 (1993) In re Robert A.
